THE MIDNIGHT TRACEDY. A STARTLING

The Grey Monk-If he believed in a Divine should not have trusted to his simdirection, for that half-insane woman to find

The Seferits, pale as the dead, and trembling very fibre of her frame, clung to the railing, I slowly descended the stairs. Step by step, and slowly descended the stairs. Step of more heart grew more cold, her eyes glared more flerce, as wildly, the fire in her brain grew more flerce, a the sessed to be going down, down, down, to the bottomiess pit! She thought the stairway would never sud—that she would never come to firm landing for her feet, beyond which there was no abyss.

At last she reached the floor, and pausing, lifted her right hand to her forehead, when the dagger which it held, touched her brow. She start d, and holding it before her, glared wildly upon It. All was still, and wrapped in gloom around, save where the rays of her dim lamp feil, making ghostly shadows on the wall. As she gazed upon the dagger, her heart seemed to turn to ice : her brain to a burning volcano, her eyes grew dim and hazy, her senses whirled!

In this state she reeled forward, and entered the dark gallery, with a half consciousness of what she did; she fancled, as well as her frantic enses would allow, counted the third door-from where she had descended the stairs!

Her hand was on the knob-she turned it by intuitien, the door opened, and the sofely entered. There was the hard breathing of a sleeper, heard issuing from the bed. She set the lamp upon a small table, near the door, which she had eft ajar, at d teaning against the wall, she pressed her co'd tands against her bosom, as though to quell its perce throbs Her eyes glared wild-

For five m nutes she stood thus, ever and anon glancing toward the bed, where, though it lay In pertial gloom, the upper part of a human face could be seed, above the covering, framed, as it were, in a mass of dark, clustering hair.

"Why, what a mope am I!" she presently whispered hosrsely. "It must be done, or Eduardo can never more be mine! Why do I de-

She slowly approached the bed, and gazed upon the form that lay there. Curiosity prompted her to turn down the covering, and look at the youth she was about to send to his long account; but she checked the impulse. No, she could not look upon the face, which would soon be upturned toward her, white and ghastly in death, glaring on her with its glassy eyes.

She turned towards the window, as though with the thought of fear. Three pair of eyes were beyond that window, glaring on her with distended pupils; but she saw them not! One her arm to strike. Some spirit seemed to whisper a warning to her soul, and it fell powerless by her side. Again it was raised, and again slowly lowered. Then contracting her muscles by a mighty effort, she raised it aloft the third time—its yellow blade flashed in the lamp-light, for an instant, and then descended with a fearful force into the very heart of the sleeper.

There was a slight groan-almost like a sigh, as she drew it forth, and all was still. She staggered back against the wall.

The door opened hastily, and the Grey Monk entered, wi'd with terror. Impatient at her long the door of Travis' room fastened, soon saw the light through the door of the next room. A sudden terror seized upon him, as he rushed in, and beheld her standing against the wall, the bloody darger in ber hand. 'Woman! fiend! whom have you slain?" he cried, frantically. "Your viction!" she murmured, in deep, startling tones. "Ged of Heaven!" he cried, starting forward

4. She has mistaken the room, and slain my orc oon! Where is Travis?" "Here!" cried a voice of thunder, and the win dow opening suddenly, discovered Travis, with drawn aword, standing upon the sill. "Travis no more!" he cried. 'But Julian Marci de Marsago-the returned exile, who claims your blood and soul! Pedro Gonzalenza-Arch-bishop of Mexico-foul fiend of Hell! Your hour of retribution has come! Before you, lies your natural son, Eduardo Castillias Gonzalenza, slain by the dagger which you had intended for me. He robbed me of a sister, and deserved his fate. You robbed me of father mother, and estates, and sent me adrift upon the world, penniless and a beggar. I then swore a deep and terrible revenge, which, by my slaughtered kindred, I now his body, and the priest, with a prayer for mercy on his lips, fell lifeless on the floor!

Travis-er Julian Maringo, as we must now call him-turned round, and beheld the woman who had alain Castillias, supported in the arms of Kit Gelan, while Mariano was trying to re-

"War car, she be?" asked he, as he peered closely in o her face.

Itis vo ce aroused her in an instant. She open ed her eyes, and raising herself up, she fixed her wild gaze upon bim.

"Brother-Julian-don't you know me?" she exclaime d. Julian staggered back as if a bullet had entered his heart. Staring wildly, for a moment, into her face, be took a step forward, and exclaim-

"Zar, my sister-can it be you?" "It is -it is !" she murmured, no longer able to stand, and sinking into the arms of the ran-Julian covered his face with his hands, bent his head upon his breast. "This is as it should be," be murmured, in broken voice, "Castillias has met his death by the hand of her he betrayed."

He cid not see the petite form that glided through the door, and recoiled with horror, as she beheld the Grey Monk lying dead upon the floor. No one seemed to see her. A moment she stood there, gazing wildly upon the corpse, then glancing frantically about her, her gaze fell upon Julian, who stood thoughtfully, his bloody sword still in his hand. Snatching a dagger from her bosom, she recoiled a step, then with a wild bound like a young panther, she aimed a blow full at his heart. But it did not reach its destination. One of all there -- seemingly insensible, had observed her every movement, and Zara, throwing herself upon her brother's neck, received Vito's dagger in her breast. -She had expiated her crimes !

The next morning there were three dead bodies in a room in the Posada Nacional. There were neveral persons also missing. Don Constance Valerie, and his servent had mysteriously disappeared. The Sefforn Leols Violents, and her maid, Mariano, could nowhere be found.
